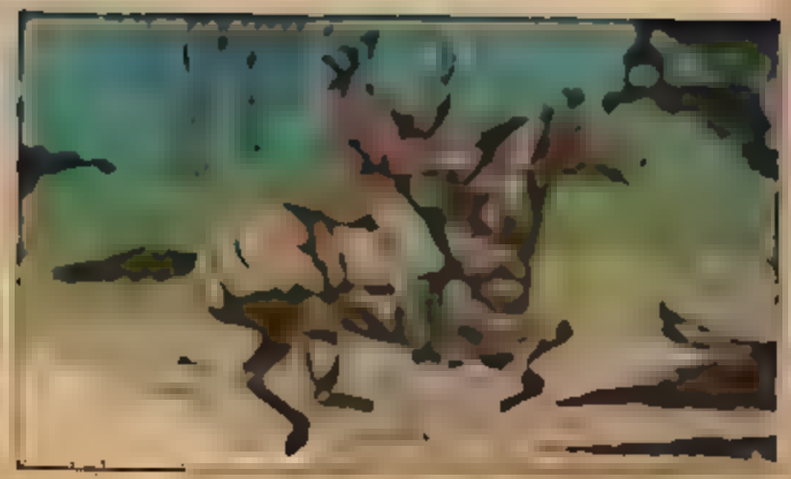
AMERICAN HERITAGE

PAUL REVERE



The story of Paul Revere's ride is well known to every American and he has become a popular hero because of the part he played in the Revolutionary War. Longfellow was inspired to write a poem, "Paul Revere's Ride," about that memorable event in American history. The historic ride began when it became known to American patriots that General Gage, the British Commander, was about to send troops to destroy American military stores at Concord in Massachusetts. They were to go by way of Lexington and arrest the revolutionary leader Samuel Adams and John Hancock. Revere was ordered to go ahead of the enemy to Lexington with his warning. Revere arranged with two other patriots to light lanterns in the North Church steeple, two lights if the [illegible] ng by water, [illegible] arriving by [illegible].

Paul Revere was the son of a silversmith and learned the trade well. Many of his works are now regarded as master- [illegible] many engravings, among them being his famous "The Boston Massacre." He cast bullets and cannon during the war and later, church bells. In 1808 he discovered a new process for rolling sheet copper, an important contribution to American business and the copper industry. A true American, born in Boston, Revere designed and printed the first Continental money.

Paul Revere played an important part in the Boston Tea Party, worked hard for ratification of the Constitution, was a Lieutenant Colonel of a Massachusetts artillery regiment and official courier of the Massachusetts Provincial Assembly. Here is an American who combined all the [illegible] he word American [illegible] He was a fighter for [illegible] n artist and artisan, inventor and a good business man.

On January 28, 1848, gold was discovered at Sutter's mill in Northern California, near San Francisco. When the news leaked out people began pouring into California. By 1849, many had trudged 3000 miles across the country in wagon trains. Others traveled 17,000 miles by ship down around Cape Horn and up into California. From all over the country the "forty-niners" came, young and old alike, to search for gold.

Within a few years, San Francisco had grown from a little village of 200 people to a city of over 20,000. There were few goods to buy for so many people. Everyone had money and prices soared sky-high. Eggs sold for $1 each, chickens were $16, $18 for a pair of boots, 75c for an apple, 50c for a newspaper, etc.

Everyone was so busy looking for gold that they neglected everything else. Believe it or not, some of the miners had their clothes washed in China. The ships leaving for China would carry the laundry with them and another ship returning to San Francisco would bring it back clean.

All this gold attracted many crooked gamblers and gunmen. One holdup man named Williams was arrested and tried for robbery but the judge let him go free. A few days later Williams held up the judge.

Many forty-niners left for California unprepared for the long trip across the continent, as a result a great many perished on the way from hunger, thirst, disease, or by Indian attacks. "Death Valley" was so named because many died trying to go through it.

John Sutter who owned the land where the gold was discovered, got nothing for his property and died a poor man. After a few years the gold began to give out. Mining camps where thousands of people lived were suddenly deserted and became "ghost towns"; these towns can still be seen today if you travel through the West.
